A

master plan is an overall guide. It does not describe specific projects or design details, but rather establishes the larger context for them. Since the Campus Master Plan focuses on campuswide issues, specific projects are dealt with separately. At any one time, more than 700 campus improvement projects are in process. The funding for these projects comes from many public and private sources, often in complex combinations. The master plan helps to ensure the value of the experiences and the success and long life of the project.

Much improvement has come to the campus in the past few years with much more under way. Gerald Broder, provost, points to the library and to the campus in the past 30 years, and change is likely in the coming decades. As the city grows and changes on all sides of the campus, Mizou must plan carefully for the best use of every square foot of land because a significant increase in land holdings is not expected. Independent studies by outside consultants have identified space needs for many parts of the campus. Program planning for colleges, schools and services helps develop the best match between programs, people and facilities. As with campus land, campus buildings are under continuing study, for optimum efficiency and attractiveness.

The plan seeks to identify one campus’ enduring features of design, which are expected to remain unchanged in Mizou continues now the constant adjustments to facilities that are characteristic of a large university. The recommendations made from it should help to assure maximum campuswide improvements as simple and quickly as possible, in a manner consistent with University assumptions for limited funding, a limited construction program, a stable population and a permanent campus of great importance. Most complex issues are located in the center of campus, which also offers the greatest opportunities for improvement. Therefore, it has been the focus of attention so far. Other areas will be treated more fully in the planning process continues.
